Abstract :

Despite growing inequalities, and both internal (CCP leadership, policy makers) and external (scholars) views of it as undesirable and potentially politically problematic, previous studies have found little ‘anger’ across the Chinese population. That previous research has focused mainly on income inequalities, but there are other dimensions to inequality and an important one is access to health care. Do Chinese people tolerate differential access to health services? Or are inequalities in access to health care a more likely source of anger and dissatisfaction with government? This paper examines data from a nationwide survey (n=3,684) of the Chinese population conducted in late 2012 and early 2013. We examine perceptions of inequalities in access to health care – between rich and poor, urban and rural residents, civil servants and others, and between migrants and non-migrants — and we use multivariate analysis to explore who is most dissatisfied with those inequalities.
